- 1) Structure determines function: amino acid sequence determines the 3D structure, which then determines cellular function and comparable proteins often differentiate between the various amino acid sequence changes.
- 2) Structure does not always determine function: the structure determines the function, but some proteins can still function with less than a full 3D structure (disordered proteins) for signalling purposes.
- 3) Change and disease: when a mutation changes the structure, sometimes a disease can arise (sickle cell disease) or when a mutation allows cells to grow (cancer) or to spread (metastasis).
- 4) Structure important in signalling: binding to a substance, specific to the protein structure. Bound as a substrate or target, a full 3D structure, binding site, needed.
- 5) Change and function: changes in structure for proteins that perform catalytic functions and in enzymes.
