and in the finished text a number of the other characters try to make Laura Wing realize that her standards are just too high and that she applies them too rigidly for modern society A London Life and Other Tales Henry James, 2008-11-01 A London Life, and Other Tales Генри Джеймс, 2021-12-02 A London Life Henry James, 2021-04-07 Lady Davenant still went from country house to country house all winter as she had done all her life and when Laura asked her she told her the places and the people she probably should find at each of them Such an enumeration was much less interesting to the girl than it would have been a year before she herself had now seen a great many places and people and the freshness of her curiosity was gone But she still cared for Lady Davenant's descriptions and judgments because they were the thing in her life which when she met the old woman from time to time most represented talk the rare sort of talk that was not mere chaff That was what she had dreamed of before she came to England but in Selina's set the dream had not come true In Selina's set people only harried each other from morning till night with extravagant accusations it was all a kind of horse play of false charges When Lady Davenant was accusatory it was within the limits of perfect verisimilitude Laura waited for Mrs Berrington to come in but she failed to appear so that the girl gathered her waterproof together with an intention of departure But she was secretly reluctant because she had walked over to Plash with a vague hope that some soothing hand would be laid upon her pain If there was no comfort at the dower house she knew not where to look for it for there was certainly none at home not even with Miss Steet and the children It was not Lady Davenant's leading characteristic that she was comforting and Laura had not aspired to be coaxed or coddled into forgetfulness she wanted rather to be taught a certain fortitude how to live and hold up one's head even while knowing that things were very bad A brazen indifference it was not exactly that that she wished to acquire but were there not some sorts of indifference that were philosophic and noble Could Lady Davenant not teach them if she should take the trouble The girl remembered to have heard that there had been years before some disagreeable occurrences in her family it was not a race in which the ladies inveterately turned out well Yet who to day had the stamp of honour and credit of a past which was either no one's business or was part and parcel of a fair public record and carried it so much as a matter of course She herself had been a good woman and that was the only thing that told in the long run It was Laura's own idea to be a good woman and that this would make it an advantage for Lady Davenant to show her how not to feel too much As regards feeling enough that was a branch in which she had no need to take lessons A London Life, and Other Tales (Annotated) Henry James, 2016-09-29 A collection of short stories A London life The Patagonia The liar Mrs Temperly A London Life is a novella by Henry James first published in Scribner's Magazine in 1888 The plot revolves around a crumbling marriage and its impact on many other people especially Laura Wing the sister of the soon to be divorced wife Laura is a classic Jamesian central consciousness whose reflections and emotions color the presentation of the storyline and the other characters The tale is notable for its straightforward even hard edged approach to sexuality and divorce This might reflect the influence of French naturalism on James during the 1880s The Liar is a short story by Henry James which first appeared in The Century Magazine in May June 1888 and in book form the following year Macmillan and Co London It is the story of a young man's dilemma when he meets a woman he used to love and finds her married to a man of a vile dishonest nature Concerned that her own purity has been spoilt he tests her to see whether she is only shielding her husband out of love and is shocked to find that she will go even to the lengths of sacrificing an innocent victim rather than admitting her husband's true character

A London Life Henry James, 2021-02-14 It was raining apparently but she didn't mind she would put on stout shoes and walk over to Plash She was restless and so fidgety that it was a pain there were strange voices that frightened her they threw out the ugliest intimations in the empty rooms at home She would see old Mrs Berrington whom she liked because she was so simple and old Lady Davenant who was staying with her and who was interesting for reasons with which simplicity had nothing to do Then she would come back to the children's tea she liked even better the last half hour in the schoolroom with the bread and butter the candles and the red fire the little spasms of confidence of Miss Steet the nursery governess and the society of Scratch and Parson their nicknames would have made you think they were dogs her small magnificent nephews whose flesh was so firm yet so soft and their eyes so charming when they listened to stories Plash was the dower house and about a mile and a half through the park from Mellows It was not raining after all though it had been there was only a grayness in the air covering all the strong rich green and a pleasant damp earthy smell and the walks were smooth and hard so that the expedition was not arduous The girl had been in England more than a year but there were some satisfactions she had not got used to yet nor ceased to enjoy and one of these was the accessibility the convenience of the country Within the lodge gates or without them it seemed all alike a park it was all so intensely property The very name of Plash which was quaint and old had not lost its effect upon her nor had it become indifferent to her that the place was a dower house the little red walled ivied asylum to which old Mrs Berrington had retired when on his father's death her son came into the estates Laura Wing thought very ill of the custom of the expropriation of the widow in the evening of her days when honour and abundance should attend her more than ever but her condemnation of this wrong forgot itself when so many of the consequences looked right barring a little dampness which was the fate sooner or later of most of her unfavourable judgments of English institutions Iniquities in such a country somehow always made pictures and there had been dower houses in the novels mainly of fashionable life on which her later childhood was fed The iniquity did not as a general thing prevent these retreats from being occupied by old ladies with wonderful reminiscences and rare voices whose reverses had not deprived them of a great deal of becoming hereditary lace In the park half way suddenly Laura stopped with a pain a moral pang that almost took away her breath she looked at the misty glades and the dear old beeches so familiar they were now and loved as much as if she owned them they seemed in their unlighted December bareness conscious of all the trouble and they made her conscious of all the change A year ago she knew nothing and now she knew almost everything and the worst of her knowledge or at least the worst of the fears she had raised upon it had come to her in that beautiful place where everything was so full of peace and purity of the air of happy submission to immemorial law The place was the same but her eyes were different they had seen such sad bad things in so short a time Yes the time was short and everything was strange Laura Wing was too uneasy even to sigh and as she walked on she lightened her tread almost as if she were going on tiptoe
