A scientist is interested in the issue of how the bar-headed geese manage to survive while at low altitudes in their wintering grounds in India. She plans her research program to address the following questions. Which one is at the ECOLOGY level?

- A) Is cellular respiration more efficient in bar-headed geese compared to other birds in India, allowing them to produce sufficient ATP even though their Hb releases less O<sub>2</sub> at low elevations?
- B) If an allele arises that causes these geese to express a different Hb gene while over-wintering in India, would it spread through the population or not?
- C) What is the quaternary shape of the hemoglobin used by the geese on their wintering grounds?
- D) When the geese are at low altitudes, do they increase their body temperature (which could shift the Hb-O<sub>2</sub> dissociation curve the right), e.g. by shivering their muscles?
- E) Given that the geese have less O<sub>2</sub> available for flight on the - Answer-E) Given that the geese have less O<sub>2</sub> available for flight on their wintering grounds, do they suffer higher risks of predation compared with other species of geese that over-wintering in the same locations?

You observe that two species of owls both have white plumage (=feathers) and you hypothesize that this similarity is due to convergent evolution. All of the following observations would support this hypothesis EXCEPT:

- A) Natural selection favors white plumage in both species of owl.
- B) Both species evolved from the same recent ancestor that also had white plumage.
- C) The white feathers are caused by different mutations in different genes that impact feather color.
- D) Both species live in habitats that are snowy for much of the year. - Answer-B) Both species evolved from the same recent ancestor that also had white plumage.

In your community, a new virus has been introduced from Australia, which no one in the community has had contact with. The only available test for the infection with this virus determines whether antibodies exist in the blood of the person. Three days ago, you were in contact with a person infected with this new virus. Can you take the test today and get a reliable result?
