The History of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages Volume III Henry Charles Lea, 2022-10-13 Excerpt In a former chapter we considered the Mendicants as an active agency in the suppression of heresy One of the Orders however by no means restricted itself to this function and we have now to examine the career of the Franciscans as the subjects of the spirit of persecuting uniformity which they did so much to render dominant While the mission of both Orders was to redeem the Church from the depth of degradation into which it had sunk the Dominicans were more especially trained to take part in the active business of life They therefore attracted the more restless and aggressive spirits they accommodated themselves to the world like the Jesuits of later days and the worldliness which necessarily came with success awakened little antagonism within the organization Power and luxury were welcomed and enjoyed Even Thomas Aquinas who as we have seen eloquently defended against William of Saint Amour the superlative holiness of absolute poverty subsequently admitted that poverty should be proportioned to the object which an Order was fitted to attain

The Life of Joan of Arc (Complete) Anatole France, 2020-09-28 FROM Neufchâteau to Vaucouleurs the clear waters of the Meuse flow freely between banks covered with rows of poplar trees and low bushes of alder and willow Now they wind in sudden bends now in gradual curves for ever breaking up into narrow streams and then the threads of greenish waters gather together again or here and there are suddenly lost to sight underground In the summer the river is a lazy stream barely bending in its course the reeds which grow upon its shallow bed and from the bank one may watch its lapping waters kept back by clumps of rushes scarcely covering a little sand and moss But in the season of heavy rains swollen by sudden torrents deeper and more rapid as it rushes along it leaves behind it on the banks a kind of dew which rises in pools of clear water on a level with the grass of the valley This valley two or three miles broad stretches unbroken between low hills softly undulating crowned with oaks maples and birches Although strewn with wild flowers in the spring it looks severe grave and sometimes even sad The green grass imparts to it a monotony like that of stagnant water Even on fine days one is conscious of a hard cold climate The sky seems more genial than the earth It beams upon it with a tearful smile it constitutes all the movement the grace the exquisite charm of this delicate tranquil landscape Then when winter comes the sky merges with the earth in a kind of chaos Fogs come down thick and clinging The white light mists which in summer veil the bottom of the valley give place to thick clouds and dark moving mountains but slowly scattered by a red cold sun Wanderers ranging the uplands in the early morning might dream with the mystics in their ecstasy that they are walking on clouds Thus after having passed on the left the wooded plateau from the height of which the chateau of Bourlémont dominates the valley of the Saonelle and on the right Coussey with its old church the winding river flows between le Bois Chesnu on the west and the hill of Julien on the east Then on it goes passing the adjacent villages of Domremy and Greux on the west bank and separating Greux from Maxey sur Meuse Among other hamlets nestling in the hollows of the hills or rising on the high ground it passes Burey la Cte Maxey sur Vaise and Burey en Vaux and flows on to water the beautiful meadows of Vaucouleurs In this little village of Domremy situated at least seven and a half miles further down the river than Neufchâteau and twelve and a half above Vaucouleurs there was born about the year 1410 or 1412 a girl who was destined to live a remarkable life She was born poor Her father Jacques or Jacquot d'Arc a native of the village of Ceffonds in Champagne was a small farmer and himself drove his horses at the plough His neighbours men and women alike held him to be a good Christian and an industrious workman His wife came from Vouthon a village nearly four miles northwest of Domremy beyond the woods of Greux Her name being Isabelle or Zabillet she received at some time exactly when is uncertain the surname of Romée That name was given to those who had been to Rome or on some other important pilgrimage and it is possible that Isabelle may have acquired her name of Romée by assuming the pilgrim's shell and staff One of her brothers was a parish priest another a tiler she had a nephew who was a carpenter She had already borne her husband three children Jacques or Jacquemin Catherine and Jean
