

Developmental Disabilities: Best Practice and Support

 Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Introduction

The first mention of developmental disability (DD) at the state legislative level is given in the last century. In 1975, the government signs "The DD Act," ruling those conditions that affect the possibility of human development. They cause varying degrees of functional limitations regarding learning, group behavior, language, communication, socialization or mobility of a person. The most common conditions in the world include Down syndrome, autism or cerebral palsy. It is important to note that in families with a special child, the environment and his psychological well-being play a significant role in development. Since the main influence on a child with special needs is the family, the situation in the house should be appropriate. Family therapy in such cases helps parents and other family members accept what happened and work through the grief. Thus, attending support groups and treating the problem through family therapy can create a healthier environment for a child with special needs to develop more successfully.

Treatment for a Developmental Disability

The question of family therapy and the creation of support groups for families with similar problems has arisen relatively recently. The origins of support for families with special needs date back to around the 1950s after the end of World War II (Hanna, 2018). Medicine throughout the country was improving, the economy was getting stronger, and the entire territory was marked by the struggle for civil rights. These factors in the political, economic and social spheres set the stage for the emergence of family therapy and support groups.

Later, a wider movement to help families began, which became a turning point in therapy. In the 1960s, more active participation of parents with children with disabilities in the social life of society began. There was an association of parents who saw their goal as helping their children with developmental disabilities. They proclaimed the idea
