

Abstract

Business owners, managers, and employees are all responsible for creating a safe and healthy work environment. This responsibility is shared and cannot be placed on any one person. The most important step in creating a safe and healthy work environment is to identify and eliminate hazards. Hazards are anything that could cause harm or injury to workers. Hazards can be physical, chemical, biological, or psychological. Physical hazards include things like slippery floors, loose wires, and unguarded machinery. Chemical hazards include things like toxic substances, flammable liquids, and corrosive materials. Biological hazards include things like bacteria, viruses, and fungi. Psychological hazards include things like stress, harassment, and discrimination. Once hazards are identified, they should be eliminated or controlled. This can be done by changing the way work is done, using safer equipment, or providing training to workers. If hazards cannot be eliminated or controlled, workers should be protected by using personal protective equipment (PPE). PPE includes things like hard hats, safety glasses, gloves, and respirators. Workers should always use PPE when working around hazards. Finally, workers should be encouraged to report any safety concerns to their supervisors. This will help to identify hazards before they become a problem.

Although the paper's findings were not statistically significant, they do suggest the program's potential impact on low-income students. The language students participating in the program had not been using their knowledge to construct meaning for new written passages, leaving them vulnerable during tests.
