

Understanding and using the vocabulary of the blended-learning models serves two purposes. First, it helps you communicate your vision to other stakeholders. When you explain that your design involves a Flipped Classroom combined with a Flex model, for example, other people with at least a basic familiarity with blended learning get a preliminary idea of your intentions in only a few words. Second, naming the models helps with your research and development. Other blended programs across the world are tagging their designs with the names of the models. Enter the model name in an online search at the Blended Learning Universe or in Google, for example, and you will find examples of other blended programs that resemble your design.

Blended model examples

This section provides hypothetical situations to help you identify the different models of blended learning.

Scenario 1

A class begins with a whole-group discussion. Students then break into groups and rotate at fixed times through three stations:

- Small-group direct instruction, in which the teacher uses resource books and works closely with individual students
- Individualized learning, using online software to practice reading skills
- Individual modeled and independent reading, in which students read paperbacks or listen to an audio book.

This is the Station Rotation model. Students are rotating on a fixed schedule among learning modalities.

WATCH CLIP 4: Aspire ERES Academy uses a Station Rotation to facilitate differentiated instruction.
