

Biological Processes

Biological Processes: Overview

Introduction

Definition of Biological Processes: Biological processes are the chemical and physical changes that occur within living organisms, involving the transformation of matter and energy.

Scope: This document covers the following biological processes: Metabolism, Growth, Reproduction, and Development.

Metabolism: The sum of all chemical reactions that occur within an organism, involving the breakdown of nutrients into energy and the synthesis of new molecules.

Growth: The increase in size and complexity of an organism over time, resulting from the division of cells and the accumulation of new material.

Reproduction: The process by which an organism produces offspring, ensuring the continuation of the species.

Development: The process by which an organism changes from an early stage (e.g., embryo) to a more mature stage (e.g., adult), involving the differentiation of cells and the formation of specialized structures.

Conclusion: These biological processes are essential for the survival and functioning of all living organisms.

1. The major source of energy for most biological processes is the sun, which provides light energy. This energy is captured by plants through photosynthesis, which converts light energy into chemical energy stored in the form of glucose. This glucose is then used by the plant and other organisms for energy. The process of photosynthesis is essential for life on Earth, as it provides the primary source of energy for all other organisms.
