

Using the same illustration scheme, a transfusion of type B blood into an individual with type A blood might be illustrated as follows:

Similarly, a person with type B blood must not be given a transfusion with type A blood.

Because type AB blood lacks both a and b antibodies, it would appear that an AB person could receive a transfusion of blood from any other type. For this reason, type AB persons are sometimes called universal recipients. It should be noted, however, that type A (b), type B (a) and type O (a and b) blood still contain antibodies (either a or b) that could cause clumping of type AB cells. Consequently, even for AB individuals, it is always best to use donor blood of the exact same type as the recipient blood. If the matching type is not available and type A, B or O is used, it should be transfused very slowly so that the donor blood is well diluted by the recipient's larger blood volume.

Similarly, because type O blood lacks antigens A and B, it would seem that this blood type could be transfused into persons with blood of any other type. For this reason, persons with type O blood are often referred to as universal donors. Type O blood, however, does contain both anti-a and anti-b antibodies, and thus, if it is transfused into a person of a different blood type it should be done slowly to minimize large clumping reactions.

The bottom line for transfusion is that blood types should be matched for transfusions.

Blood Typing

ABO blood typing is based upon the clumping phenomena of bloods of mixed types. Blood sera antibodies can be isolated from other components of the blood and then used as blood typing sera. Antibodies-b (called Anti-a sera), for example, would clump red blood cells containing A-antigens (type A). Anti-b sera would clump type B blood. Clumping will occur in both sera with type AB blood and in neither sera with type O blood.

In the ABO blood typing procedure, drops of blood are first secured following sterile procedures. A drop of blood is placed in a drop of anti-a sera and another drop is placed in a drop of anti-b sera. The drops are then observed for clumping. The pattern of clumping or non-clumping is interpreted and the blood type determined. The following patterns occur for the various blood types:

Blood Type	Anti-a Sera	Anti-b Sera
A	clumping	no clumping
B	no clumping	clumping
AB	clumping	clumping
O	no clumping	no clumping
