

The body's sensory receptors react to stimuli or changes occurring within the body and in the external environment. When triggered, these receptors send nerve impulses along afferent pathways to the brain for interpretation. Thus, these specialized parts of the nervous system allow the body to assess and adjust to changing conditions in order to maintain homeostasis.

The minute receptors of general sensation that react to touch—pressure, pain, temperature changes, and muscle tension—are widely distributed in the body. In contrast, receptors of the special senses—sight, hearing, equilibrium, smell, and taste—tend to be localized and in many cases are quite complex.

The structure and function of the special sense organs are the subjects of the activities in this chapter.
