

Chromosomes, genes and DNA

The chromosomes you inherit from your parents carry all the information needed to make a new you. The information is kept in the form of genes. Each gene is a small section of DNA. Life as we know it depends on the properties of this complicated chemical, so it seems amazing to think we have only understood it for about 50 years!

- A gene is a unit of hereditary material located on the chromosomes.

DNA is a long molecule, made up of two strands twisted together to make a spiral known as a double helix – imagine a ladder that has been twisted round. The big DNA molecule is actually made up of lots of smaller molecules (nucleotides) joined together. A nucleotide consists of a phosphate group, a sugar and a base. In DNA there are four different bases that appear time after time in different orders, but always paired up in the same way. The bases link the two strands of the DNA molecule together. Genes are made up of repeating patterns of bases in the DNA. (See page 22.)

By the 1940s, most scientists had decided that DNA was probably the molecule that carried inherited information from one generation to the next. But how did it work?

Figure 2.3 The double helix structure of the DNA molecule takes you deep into the chemistry of life. A small change in the arrangement of bases in your DNA would have meant a very different you.

By the 1950s, two teams in the UK were getting close to understanding the structure of this amazing molecule. Maurice Wilkins and Rosalind Franklin in London were taking special X-ray photographs of DNA and looking at the patterns in the X-rays in the hope that they would show them the structure of the molecule. At the same time, James Watson (a young American) and Francis Crick (from the UK) were working on the DNA problem at Cambridge. They took all the information they could find on DNA – including the X-ray crystallography from London – and kept trying to build a model of the molecule that would explain
