- 1859-1881 Darwin conducted an experiment independent of observing finches' collected data, population change, environmental change, finches' evolutionary processes.

Challenging Questions

- 1. What role do birds play in Darwin's experiment's ability to understand?
- 2. What environmental factors affect finches' evolutionary processes?

Background Information

In 1831, Charles Darwin's observations led him to develop the idea of evolution (the changes from generation through time).

Darwin discovered that the adaptations that an organism had helped it survive and reproduce in its environment. Organisms that were better adapted had a higher chance of surviving and passing on their traits to their offspring.

Offspring that possess a trait called advantageous (from generation to generation) organisms continue to change as they become better adapted to its local environment (change).

Natural selection occurs a trait becomes more common in a population over the course of multiple generations. This all change over time is the result of natural selection. Natural selection requires three "ingredients".

- 1. Variation: Does the trait vary independently in the population?
- 2. Heritability: Is the trait influenced by genes (can parents pass it to offspring)?
