Best practices : better matching of needs and resources will lead to better weapon system outcomes ,2001 Although the Department of Defense s DOD annual weapon system investment has been increased from about 90 billion 3 years ago to almost 100 billion for fiscal year 2001 DOD s buying power will be weakened if weapons continue to cost significantly more and take much longer to develop than planned DOD would like to get the most out of this investment and has set goals to develop new weapons in half the traditional time and within budget It has a long way to go long standing problems that work against delivering new weapons within estimates have proven resistant to reform When one program encounters such problems and needs more money than planned it comes at the expense of delaying or canceling other program This means less overall modernization and a lower unpredictable return on investment The ability to execute a program more predictably within cost and schedule estimates would lessen the need to offset cost increases by disrupting other programs
