Abstract: This paper reports on an ongoing research project to systematically investigate communication among young Russian men and women, and presents preliminary findings from a series of focus groups on "communication skills." The data indicate extensive reflection on the meaning of such skills. However, it is particularly striking that communication skills are not equated to self-expression. This paper discusses the implications.

Notes: The survey used computer-assisted telephone interviewing to obtain reliable findings. Participants in the survey of 1,000, 18- to 24-year-olds were randomly selected from telephone area codes in the United States. The sampling frame was based on telephone numbers that were listed in the 1990 Census. The survey was conducted between March 1999 and May 2000. The survey was conducted by the National Longitudinal Survey of the Youth, which is a part of the National Longitudinal Survey of the Youth, which is a part of the National Longitudinal Survey of the Youth.
