

PUBLISHER'S NOTE

This document differs in use and application from many previous AISC publications. It is based upon evolving thought on new project delivery systems in the industry and addresses concepts that are appearing in the professional literature on an increasing basis. The author's ideas involve all construction trades and design disciplines, not just structural engineers and structural steel fabricators, and this document can serve as a primer for structural engineers and others in the structural steel industry who seek new approaches to construction and new ways of doing business.

While the terms are not used explicitly, the author's recommendations very much parallel the concepts of integrated project delivery, lean construction, and alliance contracting. In many respects the concepts in this Design Guide are ahead of many industry theorists—with one important difference. The author is not just theorizing about integrating "constructability" into his structural engineering practice. Rather, he has actually done it and is sharing his knowledge with colleagues and the industry, which he has served well for many years.

This Design Guide does not constitute a code or standard; nor is it intended to be incorporated by reference into a contract document. However, it has tremendous potential utility in guiding an evolving practice and standard of care in an era when new contract documents and contract relationships are being developed to address some of the concerns raised in this text.

Several distinguishing characteristics of this work should be kept in mind as its principles are applied to current and future real-world construction projects:

1. Some of the practice suggestions addressed are clearly within the recognized, traditional province of the Structural Engineer of Record.
2. Some of the practice suggestions addressed are outside the province of structural engineers, but most are not.
3. Some of the practice suggestions addressed are outside the province of structural engineers, but most are not.
