Paper 1, Section B: The Guardian Newspaper

Context:

The Guardian was founded in 1821 and is owned by Scott Trust Ltd. It has been rated the highest _____ (1) newspaper by Ofcom (a media regulator) but has one of the lowest monthly readerships.

The Guardian is a centre-left-wing newspapers, supporting _____ (2) policies and ideas. It is considered to be a compact national broadsheet and has a tradition of investigative journalism. They claim to have a commitment to diversity.

Industry:

_____ (3) means that newspapers are controlled by a small number of companies. This results in a few having the most power and a lack of diversity in voices being heard. The Guardian claim to challenge this – see Scott Trust policy. They do not enforce a paywall this could be seen as a desire to focus on quality journalism.

The Guardian is not part of a _____ (4); therefore, the content can deviate from pluralist values. The Guardian contains wider cultural stories to appeal to more openminded readers.

Audience:

Historically, readers of print newspapers were considered to be passive (i.e. they read what was in front of them and believed it), especially as there is an expectation that what is shared in the news is true.

However, today's audiences are much more _____ (5) and can interact with the news they read. They have the option to read it online, comment and discuss below an article, as well as sharing it on social media. Digital technologies affect the way we consume media – dipping in and dipping out.

The comments section in newspapers are known as "below the line" commentary. The Guardian Online has a renowned 'below the line' section called Comment is Free that reflects the _____ (6) readers' strong belief in freedom of speech.

In 2008, the editor said the future of the press lay in "newspapers becoming view-papers." i.e. forums for discussion and opinion.

Theory:

Gerbner presents the notion that repeated representations reinforce ideas that are then circulated as 'common sense'; this could lead to the cultivation of a similar _____ (7) and passive consumption.

Bandura's social learning theory would suggest that being exposed to a repeated perspective could affect behaviour e.g. political alliances, derogatory views of 'other' groups in society, etc.

Jenkins, however, subverts these passive ideas and suggests that audiences pick and choose their diet of online news, therefore resisting ideology and actively _____ (8) their own cultural meaning (not necessarily the encoded meaning of the editor; online readers of the Guardian can comment and interact therefore shaping the way others decode and _____ (9) the content)
