

AUTOCAD: EXAMINATION OF FACTORS INFLUENCING USER ADOPTION

 ANNA BAJ-ROGOWSKA

ABSTRACT

The primary purpose of the research is to examine and validate determinants of user intention to use AutoCAD software, utilising the constructs from prior studies in a more integrated model. The paper proposes a revised Technology Acceptance Model (TAM) for measuring the adoption of AutoCAD. In the study, a latent construct PRA (perceived physical accessibility) was added to the proposed research model as a new determinant of AutoCAD adoption. An online survey of AutoCAD users was conducted to collect data. This data was empirically used to test the proposed research model. The Structural Equation Modeling (SEM) technique was used to evaluate the causal model, and the confirmatory factor analysis was performed to examine the reliability and validity of the measurement model. The study results show that user behavioural intention to use AutoCAD is significantly affected by three determinants: perceived usefulness, perceived ease of use and perceived physical accessibility of the software. This finding contributes to an expanded understanding of the factors that promote acceptance of AutoCAD software. Moreover, the main contribution of this study is to verify the impact of the added PRA variable on the behavioural intention to use and the actual use of AutoCAD, and also to create measurement scales for this new latent variable in TAM.

INTRODUCTION

Considering the rapid growth of the use of information technologies (IT) in business and in such areas as engineering, the subject of acceptance and evaluation of AutoCAD software used by engineers in the process of designing deserves special attention. An understanding of what determines the adoption of software may provide information that will contribute to the promotion of its success.

The problems related to the promotion and analysis of IT applications are among the leading fields of business informatics studies. The theories proposed in
