These authors (2000) (2002) noted further that a corporate reputation manager that prioritizes the entire firm's culture from the very outset to the most granular levels, including stakeholder-level understanding, will succeed. These companies' ongoing processes make them "virtually self-correcting and learning" and allow them to respond to the "perceived need to respond" without delay. The authors note:

- Processes specific to particular web technologies such as databases, search engines, social media, etc.
- Processes designed to handle specific events or states that occur during performance and availability
- Used to create new or revised content
- Content items follow the same sequence of handling and other actions
- Two JSPC: static JSPC: content items are automatically regenerated whenever requested for large static or content loading
- Dynamically generated static content: content items, when requested, are generated

- When capital and resources are scarce, the firm must make choices about whether (a) to grow or (b) to stay small.
- If the firm chooses to grow, it must decide whether to grow organically or through acquisition.
