A Treatise of Commerce John Wheeler, 1931 A Treatise of Commerce, Wherein are Shewed the Commodities Arising by a Well Ordered and Ruled Trade, Such as that of the Societie of Merchants Adventurers is Proved to Be: Written Principally for the Better Information of Those who Doubt of the Necessarinesse of the Said Societie in the State of the Realme of England John Wheeler, 1968 A Treatise of Commerce John Wheeler, 1601 A Treatise on the Principles, Practice, & History of Commerce J. R. McCulloch, 2015-06-24

Excerpt from A Treatise on the Principles Practice and its rise is coeval with the formation of society The varying powers and dispositions of different individuals dispose them to engage in preference in particular occupations and every one finds it for his advantage to confine himself wholly or principally to some one employment and to barter or exchange such portions of his produce as exceed his own demand for such portions of the peculiar produce of others as he is desirous to obtain and they are disposed to part with The division and combination of employments is carried to some extent in the rudest societies and it is carried to a very great extent in those that are improved But to whatever extent it may be carried commerce must be equally advanced The division of employments could not exist without commerce nor commerce without the division of employments they mutually act and react upon each other Every new sub division of employments occasions a greater extension of commerce and the latter cannot be extended without contributing to the better division and combination of the former In rude societies the business of commerce or the exchange of commodities is carried on by those who produce them Individuals having more of any article than is required for their own use endeavour to find out others in want of it and who at the same time possess something that they would like to have But the difficulties and inconveniences inseparable from a commercial intercourse carried on in this way are so obvious as hardly to require being pointed out Were there no merchants or dealers a farmer for example who had a quantity of wheat or wool to dispose of would be obliged to seek out those who wanted these commodities and to sell them in such portions as might suit them and having done this he would next be forced to send to perhaps twenty different and distant places before he succeeded in supplying himself with the various articles he might wish to buy His attention would thus be perpetually diverted from the business of his farm and while the difficulty of exchanging his own produce for that of others would prevent him from acquiring a taste for improved accommodations it would tempt him to endeavour to supply most that was essential by his own labour and that of his family so that the division of employments would be confined within the narrowest limits The wish to obviate such inconveniences has given rise to a distinct mercantile class Without employing themselves in any sort of production merchants or dealers render the greatest assistance to the producers They collect and distribute all sorts of commodities they buy of the farmers and manufacturers the things they have to sell and bringing together every variety of useful and desirable articles in shops and warehouses individuals are able without difficulty or loss of time to supply themselves with whatever they want Continuity is in consequence given to all the operations of industry
