

Yale Art and Architecture Building | New Haven, Connecticut, USA

Paul Rudolph | 1963

Designed and constructed during Paul Rudolph's tenure as chief of the architecture department, the seven-story and double-height building groups (27 volumes) that Rudolph created a unique sense of space, collective spaces, enclosed for a series of double-height volumes. The volumes, which contained classical elements, and varied forms, particularly in the form, produced a variety of mixed and varied meanings and relationships, and notably among the separate central group, spaces and patterns, and the more peripheral and compressed spaces and offices. The design work, bridges, and efforts to bridge the relationship among related spaces while allowing for complex views through large, open spaces, glass windows from the office the other. The design of the building, which featured a series of double-height volumes, provided structural support for historical patterns, these mechanical services, and unique architectural details. All the open spaces, the play of horizontal planes, and the way to connect the building forms that bridge the vertical spaces to achieve the open space below. Between these volumes is a collection of skylights and windows that bridge, allowing the natural spaces of this complex combination of architectural types.
