

Atelier

STELLA CRENS is named after a little studio behind my childhood home in northwestern France, where my father used to paint pictures inspired by the natural world around us as I bring him unexpected landscapes in still life of the food grown on our family's farm. We called his studio "Studio Papa Crenn," and it was a haven to me as a child who often felt out of sync with the mainstream culture. While my father passed, he shared with me a love of art that continues to this day, more than 40 years after we last lived, and he inspired me to become an artist myself. My father always encouraged my painting, writing, and cooking as equally valid artistic endeavors, so when I opened my first restaurant in 2011, I wanted it to be a testament to the values that he instilled in me. Putting his paintings on the walls, using my mother as patron, and doing my inspiration from nature.

In French, the word "atelier" can be used to refer to artists' studios or an artisan's workshop, and I like the way that it celebrates the intersection between art and everyday in the culinary world. When I first started cooking, it might have been largely for a chef or those to make me, but these days, I have noticed a growing reverence for food as its a medium for artistic expression. I recently read about a study in which subjects placed in taste spheres of paintings by Barbara painter Mandy Kander did not found to be more delicious than the same ingredients presented in a random landscape, and this reinforced my intuition that the visual aspect of food plays an important role. But it's deeper than a simple matter of making the food look pretty—after all, Kander's compositions are challengingly intricate, dramatic, and even described as dangerous—it's about creating and communicating an intention, a feeling, a memory, so in this it may sound reminiscent to talk about cooking with love, but the result is food can reach us in the same way as a poem, a painting, or a song if we open ourselves to receiving its meaning.
