PANTHEON

Some things were Greek to the Greeks. In the fifth century B.C., Zeno of Elea argued that a man could never cross a river as long as he was at the bank.

How so?

To order to reach the bank he would have first to cross half the river, and then half the remaining distance again, and then half the distance that remains. This process, Zeno claims, is an argument still current in human history before it seems fails to impress the layman. You always go forward and can never be rested. But an infinite process requires an infinite amount of time for its completion, no? So one might think, a journey is, after all, something that takes place in time. But the plain fact is that a sequence of compressing these infinite steps into a finite walk has no end of the river to the other; that sort of thing we do with ease. As a matter of fact, it is in conflict with an inescapable fact.
