FUEL EVAPORATION CONTROL SYSTEM

The purpose of the fuel evaporation control system is to prevent the fuel vapours, consisting of the lighter fractions of hydrocarbons, which rise in the tank from discharging into the atmosphere. The system consists of the tank, vapour separator, two float valves, a two-way ventilation valve, the charcoal filter and a charcoal filter scrubbing solenoid, controlled by the control unit. The cap is fitted with a two-way safety valve.

Principle of operation

The system mainly operates in high external temperatures, when the fuel temperature increases and so the tendency to evaporate also increases. In this situation, there is an increase in pressure inside the tank.

In particular, even when the tank (1) is full, the two float valves (3) remain open, as they are located in a higher position than the vent pipe, and so they always allow fuel vapours to reach the separator (2), thus preventing fuel leaks.

The fuel vapours reach the charcoal filter (4) when the pressure inside the tank causes the ventilation valve (5) to open. This valve also allows air to go into the tank through the charcoal filter, if this is necessary following a reduction in fuel level.

When the engine is running, the control unit drives the charcoal filter scrubbing solenoid, which allows vapours to be drawn in by the engine and so the charcoal filter to be scrubbed.

If the pressure in the tank increases dangerously because of the malfunction of a component, the safety valve located in the cap (6) allows the pressure to discharge to the outside. If necessary, this valve can open in the opposite direction, to ventilate the tank and prevent the vacuum reaching excessive values.

2. Seal the joints between the front part and the bodyshell using T-VI 854210 transparent acrylic sealant or an equivalent.
