

"But I didn't do anything out of the ordinary. I always have those snacks and soda when I'm driving late at night, and it's never been so bad that I had an accident!"

"That's what worries me, Frank. How long have you been feeling this high level of stress at work?"

"For about a year. They have been laying off people from work and I feel it's only a matter of time before it's my turn. Stacey says that we should buy stock in companies that make candy bars and soda, and I admit that I am putting on a little weight."

"This is not good. Both your high sugar intake plus the work related stress, which can cause excess cortisol secretion, can raise your blood glucose levels. High blood glucose levels like yours suggest diabetes mellitus and I know this problem runs in your family. At this point I usually send my patients to take a glucose tolerance test, but I know that you are going out of town on business this afternoon. How about we set you up for a glucose tolerance test after your trip and in the meantime take it easy on the sugar and try to relax."

"I can do that."

"Also, I think that it would be wise not to drive."
