

DISSECTION OF THE CRAYFISH

Phylum Arthropoda

Class Crustacea

INTRODUCTION:

Crayfish (or "crawdads" or crawfish as they are sometimes called) are freshwater crustaceans that are very similar to lobsters. You can readily find these in freshwater ponds and streams in much of the United States. Watch for their chimney like mud mounds in the shallow waters. If you try to catch them, you will soon discover their amazing ability to make a hasty retreat-backwards!

Give two alternate "local" names for the crayfish:

_____ or _____

The crayfish is an extraordinary example of the arthropod characteristic of jointed legs. The crayfish has twenty pairs of appendages that have been modified for specific functions. In this investigation you will locate and examine the main external structures and respiratory system of the crayfish.

Name the phylum to which the crayfish belongs: _____

State the major characteristic of members of this phylum: _____

How many pairs of appendages does the crayfish have? _____

The group of organisms to which the crayfish belongs is the largest of the plant and animal phyla. Indeed, of the millions of known species of animals, three-fourths are arthropods. In addition to crayfish, this group contains millipedes, centipedes, spiders, scorpions, horseshoe crabs, insects, and a little known animal called Peripatus which is considered to be the "missing link" between the annelids (segmented worms) and the arthropods.

The crayfish is a cannibalistic scavenger that lives on the muddy bottoms of streams and ponds. It emerges at night to feed on dead and decaying matter, insect larvae, and worms.

Tell what portion of all known species of animals are arthropods: _____

To what class does the crayfish belong? _____ Name six other "common classes" that belong to the phylum Arthropoda: _____, _____, _____, _____, _____, _____

What does the phrase "cannibalistic scavenger" mean? _____
