

The first of these is the hydrostatic test, in which the engine is run at a constant speed and the pressure in the cylinders is measured. This is done by means of a pressure gauge connected to the cylinder head. The second is the thermal test, in which the engine is run at a constant speed and the temperature of the cooling water is measured. This is done by means of a thermometer connected to the cooling water outlet. The third is the mechanical test, in which the engine is run at a constant speed and the mechanical work is measured. This is done by means of a dynamometer connected to the crankshaft.
