departmentalism the development of career principles economy and efficiency By the early 1880s administrative reform began to take a different course most colonies had either accepted or began to accept new ideas independent non political control of the public service open competition in the staffing process recognition of merit and ability and classification of positions according to value of work Taken as a whole the commissions of inquiry made substantial contribution to these reforms Some were successful in terms of implementation of their recommendations others were notable for the intrinsic value of their reports some admittedly were undertaken to postpone reform while others were instituted merely to validate predetermined governmental policies Only a few had no apparent political overtones behind their establishment However generally speaking most inquiries did make significant contribution to the administrative reform process in nineteenth century Australia and they compared favorably with similar efforts overseas
