These researchers also examined how biological responses to stressors (e.g., cortisol and other stress-related hormones) varied among individuals exposed to different combinations of stressors. They found that individuals exposed to multiple stressors (e.g., noise and air pollution) showed higher levels of cortisol than those exposed to a single stressor (e.g., noise or air pollution). This suggests that the combined effects of multiple stressors can be more harmful than the sum of their individual effects. The researchers also found that individuals with higher levels of cortisol were more likely to experience negative health outcomes, such as cardiovascular disease and mental health problems. These findings suggest that the combined effects of multiple stressors can be more harmful than the sum of their individual effects, and that individuals with higher levels of cortisol are more vulnerable to these effects.
