Abstract

Introduction: Helping mothers who have children with autism spectrum disorders requires understanding of their lived experiences. This study aims to uncover the spiritual journey as a main theme in Iranian mothers' experiences.

Method: This hermeneutic phenomenological study is a part of a larger study undertaken for partial fulfillment of the requirement for PhD dissertation in nursing. The main study was performed on 18 cases of Iranian mothers, with experience of caring for a child with an autism spectrum during 2011-2012. They were selected based on purposeful sampling method. Semi-structured interviews for data collection were used. Data analyses were done with the interpretative method.

Results: Spiritual journey is one of the main themes of the phenomenon under study in the original project. It consists of three sub-themes each of which supported by a number of common meaning. The sub-themes and their common meanings in parenthesis are (1) Descent: wondering between what is and what will be (having sorrowful tale, unanswered question, escaping from reality, losing hope) (2) Connecting to deity: reflection on the failure in her struggle (gratefulness, surrendering to god, having the divine test) (3) Ascent: helping her child in becoming all of the mother's life (to rescue, being hopeful, listening to her inner voice)

Conclusion: This research concluded that caring for the autistic children led mothers' lives to raise spirituality and enabled them to help their children and themselves, to grow and be refined in this process.

1. Introduction

Autism spectrum disorders (ASD) are one of the chronic developmental disorders that are spread in all of the world's population (Orme, 2005). ASD refer to a group of developmental disorders with similar symptoms such as Autistic syndrome, Asperger's syndrome, Pervasive Developmental, and Childhood Disintegrative Disorders (American Psychiatric Association, 2013). Today, we face the increasing prevalence of autism spectrum up to 6.0% in the world that can be future challenges for public health organization (Smith, 2010). ASD are apparent in early childhood and present a wide variety of crippling, lifelong disabilities in social interactions, verbal and nonverbal communications, and other behavioral domains (Halfon, Houtrow, Larson, & Newacheck, 2012).

For the parents the ideal image of having a normal child after discovering a developmental disorder is ruined (Orme, 2005). Children with autism spectrum disorder require more care than children with other chronic developmental disorders because of their special conditions (Sawyer et al., 2010). After diagnosis, parents have to adapt with many changes that alter their lives priorities (Lin, Tsai, & Chang, 2008). In comparison with other family members mothers are particularly affected by these challenges and adjustments, both at home and in the community (Halfon, Houtrow, Larson, & Newacheck, 2012). Being a mother of a child with ASD is not easy because these children have very distinct needs and require more care, guidance, supervision, and support (Smith, 2010). Obviously, caring for autistic children because of their particular circumstances is a strain situation for
