These researchers also examined how biological responses to stressors (e.g., cortisol and other stress-related hormones) varied among individuals exposed to different combinations of stressors. They found that individuals exposed to multiple stressors (e.g., noise and light pollution) showed higher levels of cortisol than those exposed to a single stressor (e.g., noise or light alone). This suggests that the combined effects of multiple stressors can be more harmful than the sum of their individual effects. The researchers also found that individuals with higher levels of cortisol were more likely to exhibit negative health outcomes, such as increased blood pressure and heart rate. These findings suggest that the combined effects of multiple stressors can have significant impacts on human health, and that individuals exposed to multiple stressors may be at greater risk of negative health outcomes.

Following the 1990s, the Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) and the Department of Education (DOE) have been working to improve the quality of education for all students. This has been achieved through a variety of initiatives, including the implementation of the No Child Left Behind Act (NCLB) in 2001. NCLB was a landmark piece of legislation that aimed to ensure that all students, regardless of their background or ability, have access to a high-quality education. The law set specific standards for student achievement and required schools to report on their progress. It also provided additional funding for schools that were struggling to meet these standards. Since its implementation, NCLB has been the subject of much debate. Some argue that it has led to a narrowing of the curriculum and an overemphasis on standardized testing. Others argue that it has helped to improve student achievement and has led to the implementation of many effective educational practices. In 2015, the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA) was passed, which replaced NCLB. ESSA gave states more control over their education systems while still maintaining the goal of ensuring that all students have access to a high-quality education. The law also emphasized the importance of data in making educational decisions and required states to report on their progress in meeting the law's requirements. Overall, the Department of Health and Human Services and the Department of Education have made significant progress in improving the quality of education for all students. While there is still much work to be done, the progress made in the past few decades is a testament to the commitment of these agencies to ensuring that every child has the opportunity to succeed.
