Chapter and Page Number	Entry and Response Type
Chapter 1, Page 17 (Entry 1): "Waste and punishment, misery and heroic grandeur, are the chief facts of this magnificent, comprehensively planned and otherwise faultless system of the State or individual humanization created individually. What machine would nature be submitting to?"	Comment: I am struck by the irony and the underlying message of this passage. It seems that the government is trying to control everything, even the most basic aspects of life. The phrase "magnificent, comprehensively planned" suggests a society where everything is designed and controlled, leaving no room for individuality or chance. The question "What machine would nature be submitting to?" is a powerful statement about the loss of natural order and the imposition of artificiality.
Chapter 1, Page 22 (Entry 2): "The very fact that the State is not a machine, but a living organism, is the chief fact of this magnificent, comprehensively planned and otherwise faultless system of the State or individual humanization created individually. What machine would nature be submitting to?"	Question: I am confused by the author's use of the word "machine" in this passage. It seems to be used in a metaphorical sense, but I am not sure what it is supposed to represent. Is it a reference to the government's control over the population, or is it a comment on the artificiality of the society? The phrase "living organism" is also interesting, as it suggests a society that is more organic and less controlled than the one we see in the novel.
Chapter 1, Page 22 (Entry 3): "The very fact that the State is not a machine, but a living organism, is the chief fact of this magnificent, comprehensively planned and otherwise faultless system of the State or individual humanization created individually. What machine would nature be submitting to?"	Reflection: This passage is a good example of the author's use of irony. The phrase "magnificent, comprehensively planned" is used to describe a society that is actually a dystopia. The author is suggesting that the government's control over the population is a form of machine-like efficiency, but it is also a form of dehumanization. The question "What machine would nature be submitting to?" is a powerful statement about the loss of natural order and the imposition of artificiality.
Chapter 1, Page 22 (Entry 4): "The very fact that the State is not a machine, but a living organism, is the chief fact of this magnificent, comprehensively planned and otherwise faultless system of the State or individual humanization created individually. What machine would nature be submitting to?"	Clarify + Predict: I am confused by the author's use of the word "machine" in this passage. It seems to be used in a metaphorical sense, but I am not sure what it is supposed to represent. Is it a reference to the government's control over the population, or is it a comment on the artificiality of the society? The phrase "living organism" is also interesting, as it suggests a society that is more organic and less controlled than the one we see in the novel.
