ABSTRACT

On annual basis, WAEC furnish Ghanaians with a stunning number of candidates who are caught cheating in their examinations. WAEC cancels the results of such candidates and even hand some culprits over to the Police for prosecution at the courts. But cheating continues and in most cases, increases year by year. There has been allegations and counter-allegations as to how and why these examination malpractices is on the increase in Ghana. In an attempt to unravel the mysteries of malpractices surrounding the conduct of the Basic Education Certificate Examinations (BECE), funding was sought from education-oriented Non-governmental Organisations (NGOs) and recruited thirty fresh graduates from Ghanaian universities and guided them to gain teaching appointments in schools that are noted by the community to indulge in examination malpractices, but for one reason or the other, has never been caught red-handed. The accounts of these thirty recruits spread across all the ten regions of Ghana forms the basis of this paper.

1. INTRODUCTION

Examination and academic dishonesty form substantial part of challenges facing the conduct of academic examinations worldwide. Prominent among academic dishonesty is examination malpractices. Examination malpractices are multi-dimensional, which can occur at any stage of public examining process spanning from planning, test designing/construction, administration, scoring/marking, grading and dissemination of results [1]. Ghana has had its own share not only in internally conducted examinations, but also the West Africa Examinations Council (WAEC) conducted examinations. It is only natural that ill-prepared and poor students develop the propensity to cheat in an examination as the only means of covering up for their ineptitude. The Basic Education Certificate Examinations (BECE) is conducted for grade nine (9) students as a means of assessing and consequently placing them in the secondary and technical schools in Ghana for further training. A cursory look at the BECE results as released by WAEC shows a worrying trend in general performance. For instance, in 2008, the pass rate of BECE candidates was 62.16%; 60.21% in 2009; 49.12% in 2010; 46.93% in 2011 and 99.93% in 2012. The clear anomaly in performance trend in 2012 made every concerned Educator know that cheating was being encouraged in gigantic proportions even by people in high office of government as a means to cover for the poor attention being given to the basic students. With 2012 being a critical election year in the annals of the nation, government had no option than to put their critics wrong by achieving unprecedented performance for students in the BECE to prove to all that it was, indeed, doing their best for the educational sector. Such poor performances among BECE candidates over recent years suggest that cheating will become rampant. This is against the back drop that some heads of senior high schools and concerned educators in the country have observed that there is no match between the apparently high achievement of pupils in the BECE and their performance at the senior high school level, and for that reason criticized the validity of the BECE [2]. In the past, examination malpractice was mostly in the form of students smuggling foreign materials into the examination room but this has transmogrified into more complex forms. For instance, WAEC alludes to reports of other forms of examination malpractice and irregularity the most prominent of which was collusion/assisted cheating involving teachers, invigilators, supervisors, and even proprietors of schools [3]. The report went even further to mention Ghana as having another emerging form of examination malpractice which involves the deliberate registration of unqualified candidates by school authorities. This cancer of examination malpractice has become a booming business that it could be inferred that there are examination fraud cabals who make brisk business by engaging in the unholy act [4].

WAEC has over the years worked assiduously towards making their examination results reflect upon the performance of its candidates by instituting some mechanisms to curtail the incidence of examination malpractices and to make the act unattractive. Nevertheless these mechanisms have not been as effective as had been envisaged. In 2009, 525 candidates sanctioned for their involvement in various kinds of examination malpractice more than doubled to 1,083 candidates in 2010. The figure then increased to 1,127 in 2011 before dropping to 823 in 2012 [5].

Bribery of examination officials such as invigilators, supervisors, etc who are directly involved in the conduct of examinations by candidates, parents, and even proprietors is a corruption that needs to be eliminated. No matter how corruption is defined, it weakens societies, impacts and hinders social and economic development. It diverts domestic and foreign investment away from where it is needed; it weakens education and health systems; exacerbates inequality; distorts electoral processes and undermines government institutions [6]. Monopolies and discretion are corruption facilitators, while accountability and an anti-corruption ethical ambience in communities are inhibiting factors. There are several ways in which ICT can contribute positively to changes regarding these factors [7]. The West African Examination Council has not lost the fact that ICT can help
